

Larry Dickerson has been working in the areas of community, economic and organizational development for close to 40 years. He is currently a community development specialist with University of Missouri Extension, located in Columbia, Mo. He has served in many different jobs over the years, mainly in Alaska and Missouri, serving in roles as Executive Director, project management, academic faculty, community organizing and a variety of community development activities.

Larry has a BA degree in political science and a MS in community development, as well as participating in many continuing education endeavors over the years.

He is the author of “Creating Healthy Communities, the Process of Community Discovery” and coauthor and editor of “Building A Strong Community” to be published by University of Alaska Fairbanks Cooperative Extension Press in the fall of 2013, in partnership with Tony Nakazawa.

Larry has had a focus on tourism and heritage tourism the past 25 years, and currently is Co PI on the Heritage Tourism Initiative funded by the North Central Center for Rural Development to develop curriculum, network practitioners together, and provide resources to communities and regions interested in heritage tourism.
